For example, different types of tissue may be associated with different regions of ultrasound. For example, diseased tissue may exhibit different acoustic properties than normal tissue. The identification of normal tissue may therefore assist in characterizing or classifying the tissue. Tissue discrimination has traditionally been accomplished by various manual classification methods or algorithms. These manual methods have been successful, but are limited in the degree to which they can scale to handle the large number of volume scans that are generated today. Some prior systems distinguish normal tissue from diseased tissue by first identifying regions of interest (ROI) in which the images are dominated by normal tissue. These ROIs are then shown to the user for manual segmentation. Segmentation is a laborious process, however, and cannot be performed in real-time. The invention described herein presents a real-time method of tissue discrimination that can also identify normal tissue. The ability
